

THE EVENING WORLD'S RADIO PHONE SERVICE COLUMN.

By Capt. Robert Scofield Wood.

Questions and Answers.

Andrew Perry—"Will you kindly tell me the range of the receiving set published in 'The Evening World' using a WD11 tube rheostat, dry cell battery, a loose coupler, a variable condenser, phones and 'B' battery? What could I use in place of the loose coupler to increase my receiving range?" Answer—"The set referred to uses a variable coupler instead of a loose coupler and under normal conditions has a dependable receiving radius of 150 miles; that is, providing the set is not screened by steel structures or other highly conductive media which absorb the weak signals and weaken the powerful signals. When you speak of increasing your receiving range do you refer to distance or stations of higher wave lengths. To get stations that are over two hundred miles away with any degree of regularity a step of radio frequency will be necessary, whereas the reception of stations of higher wave length can be accomplished by loading the coils.

Win. Schultz—"Will you kindly advise me how to connect a step of radio frequency amplification to the attached hook-up? Would a potentiometer improve my reception? Where and how should it be connected? Will a WD11 tube give as good results as a UV201? How many volts should be used on the plate of a WD11?" Answer—"The hook-up wanted by you will be found in the City Edition of 'The Evening World' of Sept. 29, 1922. A potentiometer will improve your reception by eliminating a lot of the battery noise and interference. The potentiometer effects a perfect balance between the filament and plate circuits. It should be connected across the 'A' battery and the movable contact attached to the negative side of the 'B' battery giving eighteen volts. The WD11, according to the manufacturers, is a hard tube and can be used in place of the UV201 in any receiving circuit. It gives as good results as the 201 tube. This type of tube will take anything up to 100 volts on the plate. It functions, however, on about 22½ volts.

Reader—"What are the values in microfarads and megohms of the grid condensers and grid leak for a UV201 tube in a single tube regenerative set?" Answer—"A grid condenser of .0025 microfarads or .005 microfarads in changeable cartridge form can be bought and used for varying weather conditions. The grid leak should be variable and have a range of from ½ megohm to 5 megohms. This leak will give all the necessary variations for weather conditions; so the receiving instrument can always be relied upon to give the best results. An article by M. U. Walden, published in 'The Evening World' Aug. 17, gives the results of experiments along these lines.

P. Thompson—"Will you kindly settle a dispute as to who discovered wireless? A says it was Marconi and D says Hertz." Answer—"There are about five distinguished scientists who claim that distinction, and until they settle among themselves the question of definitely placing the laurels we prefer to remain silent. In 'The Evening World' of Aug. 7, 8 and 9 you will find a chronological table of radio development to which we respectfully refer you.

G. E.—"Will you kindly tell me what is wrong with the enclosed hook-up, of a detector and three-step outfit. I get good results using the phones jacked in on the second step of amplification, but when the last step is cut in the interference is so great that it spoils the reception altogether. How can this be avoided and what causes it? I have been all over the set and everything seems to be all right." Answer—"Three tubes of amplification cannot be used with any degree of success because the internal noises developed in the tubes themselves become greater than the strength of the signals. Stick to the two-step and forget about the third step or change it into a step of radio frequency.
